Judge Cole held that if under the original assessment there was not sufficient publication, the act of reassessment would not apply. If the service was defective, after notice, Judge Cole ruled, it could be cured by reassessment.

The case was argued last June and the court has had it under advisement since that time. The matter was taken to the District Supreme Court on certiorari, for the purpose of testing the law, by a petition filed by Attorneys D. W. Baker and H. M. Earle for Jerome Wise. Later another petition, involving similar position.

The work out of which the charges originated, Mr. Wise went on to say, was done by the Commissioners, and the charges were quashed by the court on account of a defective notice.

Mr. Wise further said in his petition that the act of April 24, 1896, was intended to cure, if possible, those cases wherein, on account of some technical defect, an assessment or tax levied by the Commissioners, were quashed by the District Supreme Court, and that the act did not in any way attempt to cure any defect in substance, if the same could be cured. Mr. Wise declared the act to be unconstitutional.
